

PREFACE

"What a great calamity! Sky brings forth a flower! Sands produce oil! A dramatic composition comes from the South!"—exclaimed an actress in the course of introducing the Ascharyaudamani of Saktibhadra, a great drama by the greatest among the dramatists of Kerala. We are further told that the poet had to send his composition outside his region in order to win acclaim. Even if the above statement is not the whole truth, it is an eloquent essay on the state of literary affairs prevailing at that time in Kerala. But then, the Kerala dramatist perhaps did not know that South India had already produced two great plays which could stand the test of time.

The Bhagavadajjukiya—‘the farce of the Saint and the Courtesan’ ascribed to Bodhayana by a commentator and the Mattavilasa—‘the Diversion of the Drunk’ by Mahendra Vikrama are referred to in inscriptions which date back to 610 A. D. Both these plays belong to the Prahasana type and exhibit some common features such as the exposition of the hypocrisy practised by mendicants, the decline of Buddhism in the South, the laxity in moral principles and the ignorance of religious bigots.

Kerala had the privilege of preserving these interesting plays to posterity—thanks to the flourishing stage tradition. Following the bold example of Saktibhadra, dramatists like Kulasekharavarman, Ravavarman and others brought out tolerably good dramas on a wide variety of topics. A survey being conducted by the present writer reveals that there are not less than a hundred plays produced in Kerala by her sons. Many of these dramas were staged in the temple theatres of Kerala by professional actors.

As a result of these hectic activities, dramatic compositions both indigenous and coming from outside Kerala were assiduously copied and preserved. Almost every house in ancient Kerala preserved such copies in their library. The spade work of great savants like Mahamahopadhyaya T. Ganapathi Sastri brought to light a number of plays including the thirteen dramas ascribed to Bhasa and the Mattavilasa through the celebrated Trivandrum Sanskrit Series. It was Mr. Sastri who discovered and published the present work for the first time.

It is with great pleasure that I bring out this important contribution of South India together with an English translation. I am indebted to my friend Mr. M. Easwaran who undertook the publication of the work.

INTRODUCTION

MAHENDRAVIKRAMAVARMAN

Mahendravarman I also known as Mahendravikrama was perhaps the most outstanding among the rulers of the Pallava dynasty who held sway over a major part of South India during the early centuries of the Christian era. His manifold contributions to literature and architecture have earned him a permanent place in Indian cultural history.

Since the name Pallava appears to be a Sanskritised form of the Middle Persian Pahlava i.e., Parthian, the origin of the family is often traced back to the Parthian adventurers who came to India during the first or second century B.C., and their eventual settlement in the South seems to have occurred during the early years of A.D.¹ The dissolution of the Satavahana empire and the political chaos prevalent in the South gave them an opportunity to establish themselves as a strong political power and soon they found themselves in an impregnable position extending their dominion over a large part of the South. By the time Simhavishnu came to power the dynasty has come to stay and he proved himself to be its real founder ruling the tract between the rivers Krishna and Kaveri, having established his court at Kāñcīpuram.

The greatness of Simhavishnu as a ruler is testified to by his son Mahendravikrama in the prologue of his Mattavilāsaprahasana in the following words: "Simhavishnu like a mountain which bore the weight of the family of the Pallavas, had overcome all the circles of feudatory princes by his policy, had the prowess equal to that of Indra and had humiliated even Kubera, the lord of the heavenly wealth by his benevolence, greatness and wealth"². This is corroborated by a veiled reference to Simhavishnu contained in the Avantisuridarikathāsāra of Dandin, whose great grandfather was patronised by the king.³

Mahendravikrama the son and successor of Simhavishnu who flourished between 580-630 A D., was a notable figure as a soldier, poet, musician, architect, and religious reformer.⁴ A host of inscriptions and rock cut caves strewn all over the South bear testimony to this genius who gloried himself as Vicitracitta in addition to assuming many other titles. These titles found in his inscriptions reveal his astonishing variety of accomplishments rarely equalled by any other ruler.

‘Vicitracitta’

Mahendravikrama has proclaimed on various occasions that his accomplishments are myriadfold. Thus the Sūtradhāra in the prologue of his Prabasana is made to narrate that “Wisdom and bounty, mercy, dignity, comeliness, skill in arts, and guilelessness,

Trust, valour, courtesy—such qualities,
Finding no place in this our iron age,
Have made in him their common home, as blend
In Nature’s origin, the Primal Spirit,
Creations fragments when the aeon ends.”⁵

Further he states that ‘from him good poet’s verses win high reward though they are not of a high quality, for he himself is a poet of considerable merit’.⁶ That this enumeration of the qualities given by the Sutradhara is no exaggeration is proved by the living monuments of the author still available in the South. As has been pointed out, his inscriptions give considerable information on the various aspects of his diverse qualities and interests.

‘Titles’

Mahendravikrama has assumed a bewildering variety of birudas after some of which he named his architectural caves

Many of these titles are seen alphabetically arranged in his inscriptions.⁷ These titles are significant since they throw sufficient light on his personality. The following are some of the important titles assumed by him

Abhimukha—'one who looks forward'

Aluptakāma—'One who does not abandon his desire'

Anityaraga—'One not permanently drawn to pleasures'

Avanibhājana—'Earth vessel'—i.e. he whose glory fills the earth. This occurs in his Prabhasana and also forms the name of a cave at Śiyamangalam called Avanibhājana Pallaveśvara-grha

Cattakāri—Perhaps from Caityakāri—'one who made temples'

This is because he claims to be the pioneer who made rock-cut temples in South India. The cave at Maṇḍagapattu (Villupuram Taluk, S Arcot Dist.) is perhaps the first to be scooped in the South and Mahendravarman proudly states that he made the 'Ayatana' for Brahma, Īśvara and Viṣṇu without the use of traditional materials like timber, brick, metal or mortar. It was he who successfully handled hard rocks for the first time since Aśoka. He has built numerous similar cave temples in the different parts of Tamilnadu.⁸

Citrakārappuli—'The tiger among artists'. His proficiency and keen interest in the art of painting is revealed by the title. In the Mamandūr inscription he states that "he caused to be compiled a commentary called Dakṣinacitra (i.e. South Indian Art of Painting) following the methods and rules laid down for such a work".⁹

Dṛḍhagatih—‘he of firm mind’

Gunabhara—‘one with abundance of virtues’ This also occurs in the Prahasana

Kalahapriya—‘lover of fight or disputes’, which shows his war-like qualities

Kaṭṭuna—not bound by rules or regulations’

Lalitānkura—‘The charming scion of the family’ The title is used in naming the cave Lalitānkura Pallveśvaragrha in Tīruchirappalli

Lokaśālya—‘the arrow of the world’

Mattavilasa—‘the wild sporter’ The title is after the Prahasana composed by him where it means ‘the wild pranks of a drunkard’

Naiḥikāmutrika—‘one not attached to the pleasures of this or the other world’

Nityavinīta—‘one who is ever modest’

Puruṣottama—‘the best among men’

Sankīrṇajati—‘mixed caste’ or ‘the name of a musical time’ or ‘a new variety of Tāla or raga’¹⁰ The title suggests the musical talents of the royal artist

Satrumalla—‘the wrestler of the enemy or the champion against the foes’ This occurs in the last verse which forms the epilogue of the farce

Satyasandha—one who speaks truth’

Vicitracitta—‘Curious or inventive minded, or he whose mind is manysided’ This occurs in the first cave temple built by him¹¹

Besides these he also assumed a considerable number of Telugu titles, the import of many of them being not quite clear. This practice became so popular at that time that some Telugu rulers, the feudatories of Pallava overlords not only assumed the names of their chiefs like Mahendravarman etc., but also bore titles such as Mardavacitta and Madanavilāsa indicating some affinity to Mattavilasa and Vicitracitta ¹²

From the point of view of the historians, Mahendravikrama's accession to the throne heralded an important epoch in South Indian history. It marked a renaissance in the field of religion, a new era in the history of South Indian Art, Architecture and Painting, and a new impetus to literary activities. The cultural connections which India had with South East Asia in the olden times are revived and developed by the Pallava King

'Author'

Mahendravikrama was a poet and author of a high calibre. His admiration for his predecessors is revealed by his inscriptions where he mentions Valmiki, Vyasa and others. These engraved in different caves scooped at his orders, contain a good number of Sanskrit verses of a high poetic excellence and composed in diverse metres. In Mattavilasa alone he has used nine different metres where the total number of verses comes only to twenty-three. His command over the different varieties of Prakrits is admirable. "Short as is the play, it shows a variety of Prakrits, for the dramatic personae only the Kāpālin and the Paśupata speak Sanskrit, the Buddhist, and Devasomā talk in Prākṛt. That of the Buddhist and Devasomā is practically Śauraseni, but the madman uses Magadhi" ¹³

Besides Mattavilasa, the authorship of Bhagavadajjuka—another farce of equal if not more significance—is generally attributed to Mahendravikrama. This is mostly based on a reference in the Mamandūr inscription where the line "gavadajjuka mattavilasādi" occurs. The coupling of Bhagavadajjuka with Mattavilasa is taken as suggestive of their common authorship ¹⁴. But this seems doubtful since a commentary

¹⁴M. Krishnamachariar, History of Classical Sanskrit Literature, Motilal Benarsidass, Delhi, 1970, p 148 n on Bhagavadajjuka mentions the author of the text to be Bodhāyana ¹⁵

Another work called Gandhamādana which is known only from references is also attributed to him. This is based on a broken line in the Avantisundarikatha of Dandin which states 'sa ca tathā grhyamāna gandhamādana prabhrtibhiḥ Śrīvara-kṛtaih Samskr̥taprākṛtānām ca'. 'Since Śrīvara happens to be a general name of the Pallavas used in inscriptions, it is possible that the above line may refer to a work called Gandhamādana by Mahendravikrama ¹⁶. Rajaśekhara's reference quoted in the Sūktumuktāvalī of Jalhana ¹⁷ also informs us of the title Sāhasāṅka for its author which is quite befitting to Mahendravikrama. But no conclusion can be arrived at from these references till further evidences become available. The authorship of Mattavilasa is enough to earn him a unique place in the history of Sanskrit literature.

THE PLOT

The scene opens with Satyasoma – a Kapalin accompanied by his wench Devasomā, emerging into the streets of Kañci from a liquor shop, apparently leaving behind his Kapala. Both are intoxicated and in need of support to escape from falling down. Satyasoma could not even spell the name of his mistress and he calls her Somadeva transposing the syllables, to which she reacts in a huff. Now he proposes to abstain from drinking in remorse, but the damsel pleads him not to break the vow of the order on her account. He agrees and praises Śiva who has ordained his followers to drink liquor, enjoy the company of damsels and to assume simple though unwholesome attire, all as leading to the path of salvation. Devasomā points out the divergence in the point of view of the Buddhists, but he ridicules them saying that those fools declare contradictory views holding the position that pain leads to pleasure. He is of the view that a further drinking is now necessary to wash his tongue polluted by the reference to the Buddhists and his mistress readily agrees with him. While on the way to another tavern he notices the splendour of the city of Kāñcī. Reaching a toddy shop, in his present mood he draws a comparison to the shop with a sacrificial ground. They notice the dances of intoxicated men. The sight of wine stored in jugs makes them eloquent and they pray for it. But once it is offered, the Kapālin is unable to find his bowl and he asks his companion if she knows where he kept it. She is unable to furnish the information and after a lot of thinking he decides to go to the first shop they have visited earlier, in search of the bowl. Now the companion points out that it is sinful to refuse the offer already at hand and he asks her to receive it on the cow's horn as an emergency measure. His enquiry proves fruitless, though he consoles himself that the bowl is only a sign and that his occupation is not yet lost. He suspects that the bowl must have been snatched away either by a dog or by a Buddhist mendicant since it contained roasted meat. They decide to walk the streets of Kāñcī in search of the bowl.

Now, Nagasena, a Buddhist mendicant enters holding his own bowl tucked under his armpit and covered with his upper garment. He is on his way to the monastery having had a sumptuous feast from the house of a pious merchant. Devasomā notices his furtive gait and points him to her companion who notices that something is concealed by the mendicant under his arm. The Kapālin challenges the Buddhist and the latter quickens his pace to avoid trouble from the drunkard. This is mistaken by the Kapālin as a sign of theft and prevents Nāgasena, who does not fail to notice the beauty of the damsel. The Kapālin wants to see the bowl of the mendicant and demands it, but the latter objects to it since the food is to be covered always. The mendicant now wails calling the name of the Buddha. The Kapālin wants him to address Kharapata the promulgator of the art of theft.¹⁸ Devasomā asks him to have another drink since it will take some time to settle the dispute. The Kapālin agrees to it and both of them drink liquor offering the rest to Nāgasena.

¹⁸Kharapata as an author of the science of thieving is known since the time of the Arthaśāstra.

who had to forgo this golden opportunity for fear of others seeing him drinking. He pleads them to leave him alone while others want him to give up his bowl. The Buddhist pretends ignorance and the Kapālin remarks that it is only expected from him since Buddhists in general negate the existence of worldly objects. The Kapālin tries to take the bowl by force at the suggestion of his wench and falls down receiving a kick from the Buddhist. In trying to attack the Buddhist the girl also falls down and the former picks her up in compassion. Now the Kapālin raises his voice and accuses the Buddhist of taking away his wench from him. The explanation of the Buddhist does not appeal to him since if it were due to compassion he was the one who fell down first. He again bewails for help in an attempt to secure the bowl.

Babhrukalpa—a Paśupata comes on the scene and is approached to arbitrate the issue by the disputants. The newcomer notices the damsel, who was his own bawd till the Kapālin lured her away showing a few pieces of shells kept in his pocket. So he decides to avenge his loss by encouraging the opposition. The Buddhist explains his position and recites the moral rules which bind him. In reply the Kapālin says that truth is his guiding principle. At last the Buddhist is forced to show his bowl which is of a different size and colour. Seeing it the Kapālin and his damsel dance in joy. The Buddhist again sticks to his canonical sayings and remarks that the Kapālin should really be ashamed instead of dancing. The Kapālin stands his ground and claims that it is his bowl and the sight of it makes him dance. The Buddhist asks the Kapālin to note the colour of the bowl which is dark and hence it does not belong to the Saivite. But the latter is of the opinion that the former could very well have changed its colour as in the case of his cloth which has turned red from its original white colour. The wench is sorry that their bowl has been polluted, but her lover consoles her pointing out the possibility of getting it purified. Now the Buddhist points to the size of the bowl again to be intimidated by the Kapālin who accuses him of practising jugglery. The former is ready to part with his bowl in this hopeless situation. Babhrukalpa admits that he could not judge the merits of the issue and suggests that they go before the court. The girl is sure that they will lose the case since the rich Buddhist could easily bribe the officers. Babhrukalpa rejects her fear and promises justice. The Kapālin agrees to the proposal and all of them are on their way to the judicial court.

Now a madman comes their way holding a Kapāla rescued from a dog and offers it to Babhrukalpa as gift. But he is prompted to hand it over to the Kapālin—a worthy recipient. The madman places the bowl at the feet of the Kapālin in reverence and falls at his feet. The latter claims it to be the bowl lost by him and tries to grab it, when the madman runs away snatching it from him in a fit of anger. The Kapālin is once again helpless and bewails for help. All of them try to hold the lunatic and by their cajolery they induce him to return it to the Kapālin. The madman does accordingly and goes on his way.

Now all of them are happy. The Kapālin feels that his penance has borne fruit since he got his bowl back. Babhrukalpa thinks that truth always prevails since the Buddhist was saved from the grapple of the intoxicated couple. The Kapālin offers unconditional apology to the Buddhist who gracefully accepts it. All of them go their way and the farce comes to an end with the usual epilogue with a reference to the ruling king who is the author himself.

CHARACTERS

The characters in the farce are drawn from contemporary life. The Bauddha mendicants, Kapālikas and Paśupatas are among the inhabitants of Kāñcī when Mahendravarikrama ruled over the region. From the references of Hieun Tsang who testifies that a large number of monasteries of Buddhists existed in Kāñcī we know that our author has only portrayed what he has seen around him. "The characters are vigorously drawn, especially the tipsy Kapālin with his unflinching flow of logic and theology and the Buddhist monk with his leanings towards wine and beauty and his desire to find scriptural warrant for them, while the damsel's shrewish femininity is cleverly sketched, and the poor lunatic babbles and acts with a consequent inconsequence that reminds the reader of Lewis Carroll".¹⁹ This observation is to the point.

¹⁹L. D. Barnett, BSOS V-4 pp 697-717

Satyasoma referred to as Kapālin is a Saiva mendicant of a low order carrying a human skull as alm bowl Babhrukalpa the Paśupata is another Saiva monk belonging to a different order Nagasena the Buddhist is just one among those thousands who walked the streets of Kancī in the seventh century A D Devasoma a bawd belonging to the Saivite order shifts her alliance to members of different sections as she pleases The madman who comes to the stage for a short while has no religious vocation as is the case with the other characters

The common trait of these characters is that all of them are degenerated fellows who are keen only to keep up their outward appearance The Buddhist is eager to drink wine and enjoy pleasures with women if only he could get hold of a religious text where it is sanctioned The Paśupata who is chosen as an arbitrator is a biased rogue who makes use of the opportunity to avenge his grievance against one of the parties in dispute

The moral degeneration of the religious heads comes in for vehement criticism from the royal author who himself was an ardent Saivite His aim is to expose sham priests of religion and he achieves this end by the sharp characterisation of the villains whose foibles make the work a delectable farce With exception to Bhagavadajjuka nowhere else in the whole of Sanskrit literature we find a similar treatment of theme or characters

THE RELIGION IN MATTAVILASA

Though the work is only a short piece it is of special interest to the student of religion The characters belong to various religious sects of the time and they point to the degeneration of the religions and religious practices which were reduced to mockery Satyasoma is a Kapālin—a Saiva mendicant of the skull bearing order Babhrukalpa is a Paśupata—a Saiva monk of another order Nagasena is a degenerated Buddhist mendicant All of them together through their ridiculous behaviour and speech convey an idea of the religious background of the time The scene is laid in Kancī, the most important city of South India of that period

The religion of Mahendravikrama is a matter of controversy but it is believed that he was a Jain converted to Saivism

The story that Appar also called Tīrūnāvukkaraṣu, himself a convert, has converted Mahendravarīkrama also to Saivism apparently suggested in the Periāyapurāṇam is taken as an authentic tradition¹⁰. While his grand-mother was a Jain his father Simhavishnu remained a devout Vaishnava. It is to be noted that though he was an ardent worshipper of Siva he was no fanatic. In the first rock-cut temple that he built at Mandagapattu in South Arcot, he installed the Trinity—Brahma, Siva and Vishnu. Remaining an ardent Saivite he built cave temples for Vishnu at Mahendravarīdi and Mamandūr. All these show that his was a period of religious tolerance and every religion enjoyed freedom to propagate its views.

This unbiased attitude enabled him to see eye to eye with the various religious sects and made him eminently capable to criticise the bad practices which crept into the various religions. From the Prahasana it is to be gathered that to a Kapālin a Kapāla is as essential as a sacred thread to the Brahmin and that once it is lost he has to acquire another within a specified time. He should besmear his limbs with sacred ashes, drink liquor from the skull of a human being. He also carried a cow's horn for blowing during his worship and drinking bouts and in emergency it is used as a bowl to receive toddy. Since he believes that there is some relation between the effect and the cause he holds that austerity in this life would not bring happiness in another, for austerity and bliss are of opposite nature. He may enjoy carnal pleasures with his wench Kapālika who follows him even to the liquor shop sharing the drink. He holds the Buddhists in contempt.

Satyaśoma the Kapālin in the farce is critical of the life of Śakyabhikṣus. Being a degenerate man he envies the life of the Buddhist monks who indulged freely in flesh and food and became wealthy being the managers of several Viharas. They lead a very comfortable life against the very tenets of their religion. The cloth they wear is only to conceal their foibles. Buddha, their teacher, is only a thief stealing doctrines from Mahābhārata and Vedantic works before the vigilant eyes of

¹⁰T. V. Mahalingam, op. cit., p. 76

Brahmins and compiling them into a doctrine of his own. In this respect he surpasses Kharapata, the promulgator of the science of theft. His Māyāvāda is ridiculed since it is untenable to hold that ocean, mountain etc., are non-existent. Nāgasena, the Buddhist monk in the play is again a degenerate. He laments that the Buddha who has ordained an otherwise comfortable life for people like him failed to prescribe indulgence with women and drinking of liquor. He is of the opinion that perhaps the Buddha might have prescribed them also since he was omniscient. Perhaps the older mendicants must be concealing these prescriptions from the youngsters and a search for old copies of religious books will be beneficial since it is quite likely that such ordinances may be inscribed in them. He is in search of ancient authentic text with a view to helping younger mendicants.

All this shows that the time in which Mahendravikrama lived was one of great religious activity. The Bauddhas and Jainas had completely degenerated and their religion was held in contempt and their priests in ridicule²¹. According to Huen Tsang, there were more than hundred Buddhist monasteries in Kāñci with more than ten thousand monks. He states "Not far from the south of the capital was a large monastery which was a rendezvous, for the most eminent men of the country"²². This monastery may probably be identified with the Rājavihāra mentioned in the Prahāsana of Mahendravikrama.

It is obvious that linga cult was in vogue in the Tamil country in the early Pallava period. Mahendravikrama himself has been an ardent follower of the cult. From the number of shrines he has excavated for Siva and from the invocatory verse at the beginning of his work we may conclude that he was a Saiva, though not probably belonging to the Kapālīka sect which he holds to ridicule. Naturally the Saivite point of view is held in high esteem by him though he never spares a sham priest or mendicant of the religion.

The dominance of Saivism, though subtle in nature, was upheld in later times by a section of the Hindus in Kerala. The Cākyārs of Kerala who used to put on temple theatre a selected number of Sanskrit dramas naturally preferred this farce because of its religious flavour. They further curtailed the scope of the piece at a later time shunting the portions relating to the Buddhist monk and his activities highlighting only the Saivite aspect of the theme.

VIATTAVILASA ON THE KERALA STAGE

Kuṭiyāttam in which dance, drama and music combine, is perhaps the earliest known form of enacting Sanskrit drama in Kerala and it is somewhat different from other forms of dramatic representations known to have existed elsewhere²³. Kulasekharavarman, an ancient king of Kerala, himself a renowned dramatist and author of the dramas Tapatisamvarana and Subhadradhananjaya and who had donned the role of characters in his own plays, is credited with the reformation of the Kerala stage by boldly introducing several innovations which are generally observed in Kūṭiyāttam performances²⁴. In this he is supposed to have been assisted by his friend Tolan, by composing manuals on stage-craft generally styled Īṭṭaparakāras and Kramadīpikas for staging Sanskrit dramas in the temple theatre of Kerala²⁵.

There are several restrictions in putting Sanskrit dramas on the Kerala Stage. The drama is usually staged inside the Kūttampalam—a temple theatre built to specifications—within the precincts of a temple by Ampalavāsis, a section of the temple servants—the Cākyārs, the Nampyārs and their women Nanyārs. While the Cākyār performs the part of the male characters in the play the Nanyars act the role of women and the Nampyār is to work on the drum—the musical instrument known as Miḷāvu.

²³See Keralavarma Ammamantampuran, Kūttum Kūṭiyāttarum Trichur, 1114 M. E., for details.

The Vidūsaka is an essential character in this kind of performance in so far as he finds a place in the drama put on the stage. He is to recite for the benefit of the masses a vernacular translation of every verse. As in the case of Ankiya Nāt of Assam only one act of the drama is invariably covered in a Kūṭiyāttam performance and that on no occasion is a drama staged in full unless it happens to be an one act play like Prahāsanas. Generally a performance lasts for many days ranging from six to eighteen or twenty days and in the case of Mantrāṅkam it lasts for forty one days²⁶. Usually the performance takes place between the evening and midnight. The first day is taken up with the depiction of Kūṭṭupurappāḍ the starting of the play or Praveśaka also called Sthāpana in which the Sūtradhāra introduces the play. On the second day is Nirvāhana in which the Sūtradhāra who often dons the role of the principal character in the play, narrates with gestures the introductory portion of the particular act which is being staged. The preliminaries over, the story begins usually on the third day and if the particular act happens to have a Vidūsaka, the beginning of the story is further delayed by three or four days.

Sanskrit dramas are not staged as such in Kūṭiyāttam. Individual acts from well known classical dramas are selected and adapted for the stage and each of such acts is known by a different name²⁷. Every act which is staged in Kūṭiyāttam is often re-written according to the exigencies of the stage and we have manuals that help the staging of the plays, composed by Cākyars. These manuals supply introductory portions of the story to be enacted in the Nirvāhana and in certain cases vernacular translations and parodies. Without the assistance of such manuals no act of a drama could be staged and hence Cākyārs have prepared such manuals in advance for the plays or acts which they usually put on the temple theatre. According to the tradition of the Cākyārs the number of acts in which they are usually trained is only seventy two including the one-act dramas.

and Prahasanas ²⁸ These acts are selected from only 24 classical dramas and among them Mattavilāsa of the Pallava King Mahendravarman and Bhagavadajjuka are the two Prahasanas adapted for the Kerala stage.

Mattavilāsa with its religious theme projecting a Saivite point of view and describing a satirical story centering round a drunken Kāpālīka, his wife, a Buddhist Bhikṣu of loose morals, a Paśupata and a lunatic was an obvious choice for the Cākyār in search of a farce fit to be enacted within the precincts of a Hindu temple especially in a temple consecrated to Siva. The drunken revelry of the Kāpālīka is more or less equated with the dance of Siva by the devotees, who in their religious mood, identify him with the God Supreme indulging in his eternal dance. The dance of Siva, sometimes referred to as 'Mattavilāsa tiruṇṭṭam'—the intoxicated dance of the Supreme Being—was to appease goddess Durgā in her form as Bhadrakālī. Durgā, after killing the demon Dārūka, returned to the side of Siva with unabated fury and in a murderous mood. The god assumed his dancing stance to escape the fury and Durgā was soon attracted by the divine dance casting away her anger she herself assuming the same dancing pose ²⁹

The Kerala actors who play the role of Satyasoma—the Kapālīn in the play suggest his similarity with Siva and this lends a holy atmosphere to the performance. This attitude enhanced the popularity of the farce in the Kerala theatre and such performances were instituted as a mode of worship in temples consecrated to Siva by devotees to beget issues in their family. Such offerings are made to Siva in the temple of Cerumannam near Kottiyūr in North Malabar where the performance of Mattavilāsa by Cākyār is a regular feature of the annual festivals, in addition, it is occasionally performed at the request of devotees ³⁰. In order to fulfil their various desires, especially the desire to get an offspring. Similar performances are instituted also in the Siva temple at Trkkariyur in the Kottayam District. Thus the play has assumed a religious importance also at the hands of the Cakyar—an unusual status for a satirical composition.

Unfortunately no Āttaprakara or Kramadīpika giving a complete account of the staging of this Prahāsana in Kūṭiyāttam is available to us. However some old manuscripts contain certain information on this aspect, though only of a fragmentary nature.

A few commentaries or rather glosses on Mattavilāsa are available in fragments, the manuscripts being rather old and brittle. Dr L. D. Barnett has referred to an anonymous commentary upon it.³¹ According to him 'a large part of this commentary consists of Chāyā or Sanskrit renderings of the Prakṛt passages'.³² But it contains no reference to the staging of the farce. Another manuscript with the title 'Mattavilāsa prahasanaṭika' available to us again contains only a gloss in addition to the corresponding Sanskrit rendering for Prakṛt lines. The gloss is given partly in Malayalam also.³³ The first reference to the farce being used in Kūṭiyāttam performance is provided by a fragmentary account on it in the last two leaves of a codex containing the text of the play.³⁴ The manuscript under reference contains a few verses used by the Cakyars in addition to instructions on using the respective tunes in which the verses are to be sung. Yet another manuscript under the title Mattavilāsatippanam contains 41 ślokaś purposed to be a detailed commentary on the first verse of the play recited by the Sūtradhara.³⁵ This commentary in metrical form gives us some useful information as to how Cakyārs used to enact the Nirvāhana or introductory portion of the play. Even the most recent publication on this subject issued by an authority who himself has been putting the farce on the temple theatre contains only a limited account³⁶. The information is mainly gathered by him in a traditional or hereditary capacity from practising Cākṣyārs of the last generation. Moreover it is limited in so far as it refers only to the practice in vogue in the Kottiyur temple. Putting all these accounts together we may get an idea of the stage practice with regard to the farce in Kerala.

At present the performance is generally limited to the Siva temple, the stage being the usual Kūttampalam found in the temple compound. The duration is now limited to three days or evenings though we have evidence to suppose that it was not so in ancient times. An Āttaprakāra on Bhagavadajjuka states that in Mattavilāsa, the Sutrādhara alone holds the stage for seven days³⁷ and this obviously is to be followed by a further three or four days. Though there are several characters in the play only the role of the principal character, that of the Kapālin, named Satyasoma is donned by the Cākṣyār, the other relevant characters being represented by him through 'stobha'³⁸. Thus the number of characters appearing on the stage is limited to the irreducible minimum. Further, only a part of the story is enacted, the quarrel scene etc., being omitted and the performance coming to an end with the representation of the sixth verse of the play beginning with 'Udbhinnaśramavāribindu' etc. A religious importance, has come to accrue to the play at the expense of its dramatic significance.

The following is the theme of this representation as suggested by the adapted version of the Cākṣyār³⁹ — Satyasoma, a born Saivite, married a Brahmin maiden called Devasoma. Once, on his way to the Siva temple, he noticed some Brahmin enters dressed in the costume of Sthāpanāsūtradhāra. He represents by action that he is going to mount Kailāsa to witness the dance of Siva, he was attracted by the sound of the drum while he was reading the Bhāgavata after his morning ablution. But on the way he meets with some Brahmins and decides to bless them by his dance. He recites the first verse⁴² of the drama upto the middle of the second line ending with 'bhavāveśaśād' and explains the meaning of the whole verse followed by action and blesses them. Once again the process is repeated. Then he represents by gesticulation the forms of Siva and Parvatī and worships them to the accompaniment of the stotras sung by the Nanyār lady. After worshipping other deities as well he retires for the day along with others.

On the second evening the Nirvāhana, in which the connecting link of the story to be enacted, is provided. The Cākyār dressed as Sūtradhāra gesticulates the meaning of the verse already hinted at in the previous evening. His aim is to create a background for the principal character of the farce Kapālīn, Satyasoma the Brahmin holding an alms bowl and supposed to be identified with Siva himself. For this the Nanyār lady recites the verses from the second and third cantos of Kumārasambhava of Kalidasa wherein the story of the penance of Parvatī, the futile attempt of Kama instigated by gods to win Siva and the subsequent calamity in which he is burnt to ashes, the severe penance of Parvatī and the final success by winning Siva for her husband etc., are described. The Cākyār interprets through gesticulation the meaning of these verses as they are recited by the lady, who continues the story probably based on some Āṭṭaparakāra. The story is that Subrahmanya the son of Siva and Parvatī was elected the commander of the forces of the gods. The demon Tāraka was killed in a fierce battle by Subrahmanya. Then a new class of demons called Raktabījas who grew out of the blood shed on the battlefield posed a new threat which Subrahmanya could not combat. He sought the help of his father Siva, who tried to kill the demons by his spear. But to his dismay a thousand Raktabījās sprang up from each drop of blood that was shed. Then from his third eye goddess Bhadrakālī was produced and she wiped out the demons in a furious onslaught. But once the aim was fulfilled she could not be subdued and she rushed at the gods in an attempt to devour them. To appease her, Siva resorted to his famous dance in which the goddess was gradually enamoured. After portraying this story by his gesticulation the Cākyār recites the balance of the verse from the play, recited the previous day, beginning with 'Anekarasatām trailokyayātrāmayam' and enacts the meaning of the whole verse once again. The Brahmins who are supposed to surround him want to witness the holy dance of Siva and the Sūtradhāra says that it is enough to witness the dance of Satyasoma, the Kapālin, who is practically the god himself. The Brahmins agree to this and they set out to meet the Kapālin.

Thus the story of the second day not only provides a religious atmosphere for the performance but also connects up with the play at hand. All these wild deviations from the drama proper are woven around the meaning of the first verse which is in praise of Siva. According to the version of the *Mattavilāsatippanam*⁴³ only the first portion of the story ending with Kāmadahana seems to have been adapted by the Cākyār at first. This portrayal is in sequel to the meaning of the word 'Anekarasatām' occurring in the verse, since in Kāmadahana all the different emotions are hinted at.⁴⁴ It is the latter half of the story that lends a religious fervour to the play by introducing the dance of Siva, which again can well be connected with the meaning of the verse at hand.

On the third evening the Cākyār appears on the stage dressed as Satyasoma the Kapālin. The Nāṭyār recites a verse which refers to the appearance of Satyasoma who has practically identified himself with God Siva. Thus he besmears his limbs with ashes, wears matted locks and a loin cloth, holds a trident, sounds a handy double drum, sets his feet in a dancing spree, drinks wine from his alms-bowl, and runs with his faltering feet in a hilarious mood accompanied by Devasomā.⁴⁵ This verse not occurring in the farce of Mahendravikrama is recited again by the Nanyār. Now the Cākyār donning the role of Kapālīn and standing behind the curtain recites a verse of his own in praise of liquor. 'Goddess Liquor, mother of intoxication' poured into a cup, are ye afraid of me? Bereft of strength, am I intoxicated? The whole world seems to be intoxicated'.⁴⁶ Having repeated the verse he comes to the stage proper addressing Devasomā. Here he uses the text prescribed for the character in the drama.⁴⁷ The passage is repeated and the meaning is indicated by gestures. His speech is completed with a stanza prescribed for him in the play.⁴⁸ Then he dances representing by gesticulation the forms of Siva and Parvatī offering worship to them

Now all of them enter inside the temple where the performance is held and worship the deity. Once again they come back to the stage and this time the Cākṣār resting on a wooden stool recounts the whole story by gestures, giving the details of his penance along with his wife, the blessing of the god giving his identity to Satyasoma and the boon that whoever witnesses his dance will fulfil their desires like begetting an issue. He again worships the god, offers liquor in the worship, drinks it along with his wife and repeats the verse describing the effect of liquor on her. With a final worship of the god and an intoxicated dance, the performance comes to an end.

The above account of the performance with a religious outlook is gathered from a practising Cākṣār who is still active on the stage. We have already noticed that there is evidence in an old manuscript that the story of Kāmadahana was freely adopted in the exposition of the first verse. Since the manuscript is two or three centuries old the practice itself might date back to several centuries. But it is not likely that the mode of representation curtailing the scope of the farce was the age long custom, for it is an injustice to the royal author to select only a part of an one act farce and to represent it in an entirely different light. Moreover this is not the case with regard to the staging of the plays of Bhāsa and others on the Kerala stage.

That this was not the case in early days is made out by a fragmentary manuscript on staging the play.⁴⁹ The manuscript under reference gives some verses describing the city of Kāñcī where Satyasoma flourished. The Siva Temple at Ekāmra is also referred to in the description,⁵⁰ which probably is to be for enacting the Nirvahaṇa. The stealthy way in which Nāgasena the Buddhist mendicant enters the bazaar is portrayed in another stanza ⁵¹ Another character mentioned here is Babhrukalpa the Pāśupata ⁵² Unmattaka, the lunatic, is referred to as being chased by dogs and crows ⁵³ From these references we may hold that the play was staged in Kūṭiyāṭṭam during the last two or three centuries. Such a fullfledged performance must have lasted for a considerable period. We have already noticed that the Sūtradhāra alone held the stage for seven days at a stretch.

We may conclude that Mattavilāsa was a favourite piece of the Cākyār repertoire and that it was widely used in the temple theatres of Kerala because of its Saivite flavour and its overwhelming humour best suited for festival occasions in Hindu temples. It's popularity might have persuaded the Cākyār to give it a more dominant religious trait as a result of which it lost much of its dramatic merit as a farce, though it acquired a religious halo unrivalled in the whole field of dramatic literature in Sanskrit. Here dance acquires dominance over drama. Nīlakanṭha (c 10th century A D) the reputed author of Kalyāṇasaugandhika vyāyoga has hinted at this importance of dancing in Mattavilasa, for it pleases the divine beings ⁶⁴ It is quite probable that this aspect of the Prahāsana might have contributed to a great extent in preserving this humorous work to posterity

THE EDITION

Mattavilasaprahāsana was published for the first time in the well known Trivandrum Sanskrit Series as No 55 in the year 1917 by MM T Ganapati Sastri. The date of the publication is given as 18th May 1917. The manuscript itself was secured by him as early as 1909 along with those of the plays attributed to Bhāsa. A transcript of the manuscript was lent some six months prior to the date of publication to Mr T A Gopinatha Rao Superintendent of Archaeology Travancore and he has published an article on the work in the Madras Christian College Magazine (Vol xxxiv No 8, p 408 Feb 1917). This was perhaps the first notice of the work announcing the discovery. The publication was received by scholars interested in Indology all over the world with great enthusiasm. A translation of the work in German entitled 'Die Streiche Des Berauschten' was published by Dr J Hertel (Leipzig 1924). Soon an English translation was prepared by Dr L D Barnett and it was published in the pages of the Bulletin of the School of Oriental Studies London (BSOS V Part-4 pp 697-717, 1930). But these were only translations without the text being reproduced. The Chowkhamba Sanskrit Series, Varanasi has published the text with some notes and translation in Hindi based on the Trivandrum edition. A modern edition with an English translation has been a long felt need and an attempt is made here to fulfil this end.

The English translation of Dr Barnett is an excellent attempt in many respects and the present editor has carefully gone through it before attempting a fresh translation in which he is indebted to the learned European scholar in a large measure. Still he feels justified in attempting a new translation. To quote an instance, the first line of the farce. 'Bhāṣāveṣavapuhkriyā-guṇakṛtān āśritya bhedaṇ gatam' was translated by Dr. Barnett as "manifold in speech, dress, person, act and quality" obviously ignoring the import of the technical term 'vapuhkriyā'—bodily action which stands for Āṅikābhinaya along with the other modes of representation Vācika, Sāttvika and Īhārya which are referred to in the line. The tiṣṭhā printed as appendix to the present edition has clearly pointed out the meaning of the term as 'Vapuhkriyetyāṅikaśca'. Hence in translating the term as 'person, act etc' the translator has not done justice to the original.

In the printing of the text the editor has adopted the practice followed by scholars like Mr M R Kale of giving the Sanskrit renderings of the original Prakṛt passages retaining the Prakṛt within brackets. This, he hopes, will facilitate easy understanding of the text.

A metrical commentary on the first stanza of the play is appended to the edition which throws light on the staging of the farce in the temple theatres of Kerala by professional actors. In preparing the edition the undermentioned manuscripts were consulted though they seldom show substantial variations of the text.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The editor places on record his thanks to Dr. K. Raghavan Pillai, Director and Professor of Sanskrit, Oriental Research Institute and Manuscripts Library, University of Kerala, for permitting him to consult the relevant manuscript materials. He is also thankful to Prof. H. Gopalakrishna Iyer, Principal, Sanskrit College, Trippunithura who gave him access to the Sanskrit College Library Manuscripts collection, Trippunithura. Thanks are also due to Sri S Bhaskaran Nair of the Visweswaranand Institute of Sanskrit and Indological Studies, Punjab, who provided the editor with a typewritten copy of the translation of the work by Dr. Barnett. The editor is grateful to the Archaeological Survey of India for providing him with the photograph of Mahendravarman and his queens reproduced on the cover. This portrait sculpture of the royal author may be found in the rock cut Adivarahaperumal Temple at Mahabali-puram in Chingleput District.

THE CAST OF CHARACTERS

SŪTRADHĀRA	The stage-manager who is glad to introduce the play since it serves to pacify his senior wife angered by his devotion to his younger wife
NATĪ	An actress, the wife of Sūtradhāra who resents the partiality of her husband to her co-wife
KAPĀLIN	Satyasoma, a mendicant belonging to the skull-bearing order of the Śaivite sect, residing near Ekāmrānātha temple at Kāñcī. A degenerate, he takes to wine and women abusing the tenets of his religion
DEVASOMA	A wench who has befriended Satyasoma sharing his drinks. The daughter of a barber by birth, she had been the wife of a Paśupata before her elopement with her present paramour
ŚĀKYABHIKSU	Nagasena, a Buddhist mendicant who resents the elder members of the order who formulated their religious canons for their omission with regard to the rule concerning flirtations with women
PAŚUPATA	Babhrukaḷpa, a Śaivite belonging to another order. In trying to mediate the dispute between the Kapālin and the Buddhist he avenges the elopement of his wife with the former. He is also referred to as Śuranandin
UNMATTAKA	A lunatic roaming the streets of Kāñcī to the accompaniment of mischievous children howling at his back. His appearance on the scene helps to solve the dispute

The action is supposed to take place in one of the streets of the city of Kāñcī of the seventh century when the play was produced

MATTAVILASA PRAHASANA
TRANSLATION

MAHENDRAVIKRAMAVARMAN

(At the end of benediction the Stage-Manager enters)

STAGE-MANAGER

May that divine Skull-bearer (Siva)
Of unfettered omniscience,
Himself a spectator and who dances
Seized of emotions and portraying sentiments Comprising the course of the three worlds
By speech and dress by action and feelings
Grant thee glory that fills the bowl of Universe (1)

Ah! I have secured an agreeable means to cheer my senior wife who is offended on account of the younger lady, the assembly have asked me to put on a play Now I will approach her (Looking towards the tiring room) Lady! Hither, pray!

(Entering)

ACTRESS (Angrily) Sir, after all these years have you come to stage the farce of the intoxicated brimming with the vigour of youth?

STAGE-MANAGER As you say, madam

ACTRESS Stage it then along with her, who is to be delighted by you

STAGE-MANAGER I am to stage it with you

ACTRESS Are you under her instruction?

STAGE-MANAGER It is so And, by doing that, you are to win great favour

ACTRESS It is only proper that you get it

STAGE-MANAGER Madam, why not it be so? Pleased with your performance the assembly will bestow its favour on you

ACTRESS (Joyfully) Yes! I have earned the pleasure of the assembly of honourable men!

STAGE-MANAGER Sure! You have earned it

ACTRESS In that case what reward shall I give you for this agreeable news?

STAGE-MANAGER No need for a repeated reward See—

What more is to be desired for by me, my Love!
After having seen thy face
Spreading the rays of smile,
With cheeks thrilled and eyebrows arched—
A rare sight indeed! (2)

ACTRESS What are you going to stage now?

STAGE-MANAGER You yourself have said it the farce of the 'Sport of the Intoxicated'

ACTRESS Even my anger seems to be biased towards this man and it makes me speak as I feel Sir, who is this poet who wins recognition by this work?

STAGE-MANAGER Pray, listen madam He is the great king, intent on the suppression of the sixfold category of enemies, subservient to the wishes of others by sharing the duties of primary elements, by name Mahendravikramavarman son of Simhavishnuvarman—the principal mountain of the continent of the Pallava race, who has won over all the feudatory princes by his prudence, who in valour and prosperity is an equal to Indra and who has humiliated Kubera by munificence befitting his prosperity Moreover—

Wisdom bounty mercy splendour
Courage, beauty and skill in arts,
Truth, prowess, honesty, modesty

And all such qualities together,
 Finding themselves without a home
 Tend on him the only one
 To protect them in Kali age
 As creatures reach the Primeval Being
 The Universal Cause at the end of the world. (3)

Further—

In him — a mine of gems
 with wise sayings of immense worth—
 Many a speech of lesser worth,
 Grow in value coming from the good (4)

ACTRESS Now why do you delay, sir! Surely the novelty of the piece warrants early action

STAGE-MANAGER As for me—

I with my wealth in music
 Was subdued by the narration of poet's worth,

(Behind the curtain)

Devasoma! My dear!

As this Kapalin with the wealth of bowl
 And the friendly wench, by wine! (5)

(Exeunt)

Prologue

(The Kapalin enters with a damsel)

KAPALIN (Intoxicated) Devasoma! Dear It is true that austerities grant grace For, you have gained a rare elegance in no time by performing the highest austerity Thus—

Thy face is sprung with beads of sweat,
 Thy quivering eyebrows arch,

Sportive thy gait, causeless smiles,
 And thy accents indistinct,
 The pair of eyes with reddish tinge
 With rolling pupils, ends languid,
 Tresses land on shoulder's end,
 Their garland strings untied (6)

DEVASOMA Revered Sir, you speak of me as though I am drunk, I am drunk !

KAPALIN What do you say, madam ?

DEVASOMA I am not saying anything

KAPALIN Am I intoxicated ?

DEVASOMA. Revered Sir, the ground is revolving, —revolving ! I am about to fall down Support me now

KAPALIN Dear, be it so (In trying to support he falls down)
 Dear Somadeva ! Why are you angry with me ? You keep away when I reach to support you

DEVASOMA Indeed Somadeva is angry, she keeps away from you even if you try to pacify her by bowing your head before her

KAPALIN Surely you are Somadeva (Thinking)
 No ! Devasoma

DEVASOMA Revered sir, indeed Somadeva is so favourable a lady to you that you cannot call me by my own name

KAPALIN Madam, my drunkenness is at fault which caused this slip in words

DEVASOMA Fortunately you are not !

KAPALIN How the vice of liquor has seized me ! Well ! Well !
 From today onwards I will abstain from drinking

DEVASOMA Revered sir, don't interrupt your penance by breaking vows on my account (Falls at his feet)

KAPALIN (Joyfully lifting her up and embracing) Dhrna, Dhrna ! Reverence to Siva ! O my dear !

Take to wine and gaze at beloved's face,
 Don the natural, yet loathsome, dress
 Long lived be the Lord of Pinaka bow,
 Who thus proclaimed the way to Liberation (7)

DEVASOMA Revered sir, you should not say like that The Buddhists describe the path to liberation differently

KAPALIN My good lady! They are heretics For—Having accepted by logical reasoning
 That effect undoubtedly resembles its cause Miserable as they are, they contradict their doctrines
 Conceiving pleasure as effect of pain (8)

DEVASOMA God forbid! God forbid!

KAPALIN God forbid! God forbid! Those sinners who torment living beings by forcing them to practise celibacy, shave off hair, wear filth, fix time for meals and don impure garments, should not be referred to even by way of reproach Hence, I would like to wash by wine my tongue, made impure by the reference to the heretics

DEVASOMA So, now we shall go to another liquor shop

KAPALIN Dear, be it so

(Both walk around)

KAPALIN Wonderful indeed is the great prosperity of Kanci, with the sounds of drum getting confused in the din of the roaring clouds which rest on the pinnacle of temples, the market of flower-garlands serving as a model for the season of Spring, the tinkling girdles of fair damsels proclaiming the triumph of Cupid Moreover—

What those venerable sages conceive—
 They who know the truth behind—

As bliss, unsurpassed endless unique
 Here it is found all complete,
 But strange! it is sensual, indeed!
 To be enjoyed through the senses (9)

DEVASOMA *Revered sir Goddess Liquor is as faultlessly
 sweet as Kanci*

KAPALIN *Look! Look my dear! This liquor shop emulates the grace of a sacrificial ground Here the signpost forms the sacrificial post, liquor the Soma juice, drunkards the priests, cups the bowls, condiments like roasted meats the oblations, talks of the intoxicated
 the Yajur mantras, their songs the Soma hymns, leathern bags the sacrificial ladles thirst the fire, and the keeper of the shop the patron of the sacrifice*

DEVASOMA And our alms here would form the portion set apart for Rudra

KAPALIN How beautiful the sportive dances of the intoxicated, who follow the beats of drum, exhibit the diverse alterations of gesture speech and eyebrows, support with raised hands the upper garment that slips down, lose the rhythm the moment they try to put back the garment to its place and throw the necklaces into disorder

DEVASOMA Ah! The master is a connoisseur!

KAPALIN This goddess Liquor poured into the cup represents indeed the rejection of embellishments, the reconciliation of lovers in quarrel the prowess of youth and the essence of amorous play In short—

*Incorrect indeed what they say
 That fire from Siva's third eye
 Burnt to ashes the form of Kama
 But, liquefied into oil by heat
 Oh dear! it inflames the mind perforce (10)*

DEVASOMA Revered sir, it is possible The Lord of the world intent on doing good would not destroy the world

(Both drum on their cheeks)

KAPALIN Madam! Give us alms!

(Behind the curtain)

Revered sir! Here is alms! Pray, accept it, sir

KAPALIN Here I accept Dear, where is my skull?

DEVASOMA Me too could not find it

KAPALIN (Thinking) Ah! I guess that it was left forgotten in that liquor shop Well, let us go back and look for it

DEVASOMA Revered sir, it is sinful not to receive the alms offered with respect Now, what shall we do?

KAPALIN In accordance with the law of contingency in calamity, take it in the cow's horn

DEVASOMA Revered sir, so be it (Accepts)

(Both walk around and search)

KAPALIN Why, I could not see it even here (In despair)
O Mahesvaras! O Mahesvaras! Have anyone amongst you seen my alms-bowl? What do you gentlemen say?—'We didn't see it' Alas! I am undone! My penance is lost By what shall I now become a Kapalin Oh, misery!

The virtuous one who always served
Me in my drinks, meals and sleep!
Now that its absence, for good, from me
Disheartens, as of a worthy friend (11)

(Falls down and beats his head) All right! It is just a token I am not yet stripped off the title Kapalin (Stands up)

DEVASOMA Revered sir, who could have taken the bowl?

KAPALIN Dear, I guess, either by a dog or by a Buddhist mendicant since it contained roasted meat

DEVASOMA Then let us go about the city of Kanci in search of it

KAPALIN Yes, my dear!

(Both walk around)

(Then enters a Buddhist Monk with a bowl in his hand)

BUDDHIST MONK Wonderful indeed is the bounty of our lay brother Merchant Dhanadasa which excels those from all other sources. From him I obtained this alms-meal with a rich variety of fish and meat having an agreeable colour, smell and taste. Now I will go to the royal monastery. (Walking about to himself) Ha! the venerable Tathagata who is extremely compassionate has favoured the congregation of monks by prescribing for them lodging in palatial buildings, sleep in couch with well made bed spreads, eating in the forenoon, savoury beverages in the afternoon, chewing betel with five fragrant spices and wearing fine soft garments, but why is it that possession of women and drinking of liquor not prescribed by him? How could the omniscient fail to see that? I am sure that those lazy wretched elders must have blotted out from the canonical books the ordinances regarding women and drinking of liquor to spite us, the youngsters. From where can I procure an uncorrupted original text? Then by making known to the world the complete teachings of the Buddha I shall do service to the congregation of the Buddhists.

DEVASOMA Look, revered sir, look! There a man in red garments is hurrying along this main road crowded with trusted folks, with his limbs shrivelled, eyes cast on both sides and stealthy steps.

KAPALIN Dear, it is true! And what is more, there is something in his hand concealed by the clothes.

DEVASOMA Revered sir, we may catch hold of him and find out

KAPALIN Lady, we will (Approaching) O Monk! You stop!

BUDDHIST MONK Who is it that addresses me like this (Looking back) Aye, it is that scoundrel Kapalin who lives in Ekamra Well I should not become the target of his drunken pranks (Hurries along)

KAPALIN O dear! Now I got the skull His fright and the hurry on seeing me are clear evidence for the theft (Runs forward and blocks his way) Ha! Rascal! Where will you go now?

BUDDHIST MONK O Brother Kapalin! Don't be like that! What is this? (To himself) Ha! What a beautiful sister

KAPALIN O Monk! Now you shall see! I want to see that thing hidden by your hands under the robe

BUDDHIST MONK What is there to be seen? It is just an alms-bowl

KAPALIN That is why I want to see it

BUDDHIST MONK O Brother! Don't be like that It should always be concealed

KAPALIN Sure! That is why the Buddha has ordained you to wear so much clothes—for such hiding purposes

BUDDHIST MONK Yes, that is true!

KAPALIN This is that "concealed truth" I would like to hear about 'the real truth'

BUDDHIST MONK Well enough with your jokes! The alms hour is passing I am on my way (Walks away)

KAPALIN Ah! Scoundrel! Where do you go? Give me my skull (Seizes the end of the robe)

BUDDHIST MONK Reverence to the Buddha!

KAPALIN Rather say 'Reverence to Him and to who promulgated the science of theft' Or perhaps to the Buddha

may be superior to Kharapata in this field Why—

He, ere the very eyes of Brahmins,
Has built a treasure of canons
Gathering the ideas from Mahabharata
As also from texts on Vedanta (12)

BUDDHIST MONK May the sin be forgiven

KAPALIN How could then the sin of such a well behaved monk not be forgiven!

DEVASOMA Revered sir, you seems to be tired This Skull could not be easily obtained So drink some liquor from this cow's horn and you may quarrel with him with new-found strength

KAPALIN Yes! So be it

(Devasoma gives liquor to the Kapalin)

KAPALIN Dear, you too must remove your fatigue

DEVASOMA Yes, your reverence! (She drinks)

KAPALIN This fellow has offended us But our doctrine lays stress on sharing So give the rest of it to the revered teacher

DEVASOMA As you command your reverence! O sir, take this

BUDDHIST MONK (To himself) Ah! What a facile good fortune! The trouble is that other folks will see (Aloud) Lady, don't—it is not proper for us (Licks the corner of the mouth)

DEVASOMA Go to hell! How could you have such luck

KAPALIN His words falter for they stand against his desire

BUDDHIST MONK Don't you have pity on me even now

KAPALIN If I have pity how could I be 'free from passion'

BUDDHIST MONK Then if you are free from passion you should also become free from anger

KALPAIN I shall be free from anger if you would give me
my property

BUDDHIST MONK What is your property?

KAPALIN The skull

BUDDHIST MONK What! Skull?

KAPALIN He says 'What, skull?' Or, perhaps, it is only proper

Thou, the son of one who conceals
Out of delusion, expansive things
Earth, ocean, mountains—seen by all Arn't adequate to conceal a small bowl (13)

DEVASOMA Revered sir! He won't give it away by simple coaxing So we shall tear it off from his hands and go

KAPALIN Dear, I will (Tries to snatch it away)

BUDDHIST MONK Get lost, you wicked Kapalin! (Pushes him off by hand and kicks him)

KAPALIN Ah! I have been knocked down!

DEVASOMA O son of a slave, you are dead! (Tries to pull his hair and falls down getting no hold)

BUDDHIST MONK (To himself) Worthy is the wisdom of the Buddha! It is he who has provided for shaving off the head (Aloud) Get up, you sister, get up! (He helps Devasoma to rise)

KAPALIN Look at Mahesvaras! Look at! The hand of my beloved is being taken by this scamp Nagasena who claims himself to be a monk!

BUDDHIST MONK O Brother, don't you say so! Compassion to those who fall in distress is just our religious duty

KAPALIN Is this also the law of the omniscient one? Was I not the one who fell down first? Well, what purpose would it serve Now the skull of your head will become my alms bowl

(All scuffle together)

BUDDHIST MONK Oh, misery! misery!

KAPALIN O Mahesvaras! Look, Look! This scoundrel feigning to be a Monk wails himself after stealing my alms-skull Well, I will also bewail. 'An outrage on Brahmin, an outrage on Brahmin!'

(Then enters a Pasupata)

PASUPATA O Satyasoma, why do you bewail?

KAPALIN O Babhrukalpa! This scoundrel Nagasena claiming to be a monk has stolen my alms skull and refuses to give it back

PASUPATA (To himself) What I ought to do has already been done by the Gandharvas, for this scoundrel

Like a cow being led by a handful of fodder

Lures my beloved—that slave of a barber,

Showing a few shells covered by his robe (14)

So I shall trounce the enemy by encouraging the proxy (Aloud) Oh, Nagasena, is it so as he says?

BUDDHIST MONK Oh sir, you too talk like this! Abstinence from taking things not offered is our moral precept, abstinence from vain talk is our moral precept, abstinence from breach of celibacy is our moral precept, abstinence from destroying life is our moral precept, abstinence from untimely eating is our moral precept I take refuge in our Buddhist precepts.

PASUPATA O Satyasoma! Such is their rule of conduct What is your answer to this?

KAPALIN Why, our code of conduct is that we should not speak falsehood

PASUPATA Both are in order What means is there to decide the issue?

BUDDHIST MONK What reason is there to suppose that a monk who follows the precepts of the Buddha will take a liquor bowl?

PASUPATA But one adducing mere reason could not establish the fact by simple assertion

KAPALIN When it is perceptible, mere statement of reason is of no purpose

PASUPATA What? It is perceptible?

DEVASOMA Venerable sir, the skull is in his hands hidden by the robe

PASUPATA You heard it sir?

BUDDHIST MONK Revered sir, this skull does not belong to another

KAPALIN Now then, show it!

BUDDHIST MONK All right! (Shows)

KAPALIN Look Mahesvaras! Look at, the unjust action of the Kapalín and the virtuous conduct of this Buddhist monk

BUDDHIST MONK Abstention from taking things not offered is our moral precept (He repeats the same rules of conduct as before)

(Both dance) \

BUDDHIST MONK Oh fie! He dances at a time when he should be ashamed!

KAPALIN Ha! Who is dancing? (Looking at all sides) Surely he must be imagining me dancing when the creeper of my delight sways in the Malaya breeze at the sight of my Skull which was given up for lost

BUDDHIST MONK Venerable sir! Why dont you see it? O venerable one! You just ask This is its colour

KAPALIN What is there to be spoken of? Have I not seen it?
This skull is blacker than a crow!

BUDDHIST MONK Hence you yourself admit that this is mine

KAPALIN True, I admit your skill in changing colours See—
This cloth at first, by nature, partook
Of the whiteness of the lotus fibre
Now you, of unthinkable feats, have made it Into coppery red of the early dawn (15)

Moreover—

Encompassed both in and out
By yellowish red, sticking fast,
The skull bowl once it reaches you
How could be then untingured! (16)

DEVASOMA Alas! I am undone, unfortunate as I am Possessed of all good qualities, splendid as the skull of the lotus seated god, having the appearance of the full moon and with the everlasting smell of liquor, this has come to such a state by the touch of this fellow's untidy robes

KAPALIN Dear, don't worry yourself It will be purified again It has been said that even bigger things get purified and freed from defilement through expiatory rites For example—

Our Lord bearing the crescent on his forehead Having recourse to this great penance with devotion,

Was freed from the sin of cutting Brahman's head
 That leader of divine beings,
 Having killed Trisiras, the son of Tvastar
 Regained merit with his misery subdued,
 By performing a hundred sacrifices (17)

Oh Babhrukalpa, is it not so?

PASUPATA What you have said is true to the scriptures

BUDDHIST MONK Well! The colour was changed by me
 But who has made its shape and size?

KAPALIN Indeed, you people are the progeny of Maya's son!

BUDDHIST MONK How long shall I wrangle with you! You take it

KALPAIN Surely, even the Buddha has thus exercised the perfection of liberality

BUDDHIST MONK In this plight what will be my protection?

KAPALIN Of course, the Buddha the law and the Monkhood

PASUPATA This dispute cannot be settled by me Let us go to the court

DEVASOMA Revered sir, if it is so, then good bye to the skull!

PASUPATA What do you mean?

DEVASOMA Why, this man with an abundance of wealth accrued from several monasteries could fill the mouths of court officials as he pleases For me, the maid of of a poor Kapalin whose sole possession is the slough of a snake, what wealth have I to enter the court?

PASUPATA It is not so

Not crooked, of heavy weight,
 Firm, yet tender, of noble birth,
 Justice they uphold, those good men,
 As pillars support the lofty mansions (18)

KAPALIN Enough with this An honest man has nothing to be afraid of

BUDDHIST MONK Revered sir, you just lead the way

PASUPATA Certainly

(They all walk about)

(Then enters a madman)

MADMAN There is that wicked dog You run off with a skull full of roasted meat Son of slave¹, where are you going? Now he comes towards me dropping the skull and intent on biting me (Looking around) I will smash his teeth with this stone What! You run off leaving the skull? The crazy wicked dog that you are why are you angry with me for such bravery? The ocean having reached upto the sky on the back of a domestic pig smashed Ravana and seized the sea-monster the son of Sukra¹ Hallo, castor oil-plant¹, what do you say? Untrue Untrue! But this frog with paws as big as a mace is my witness Or, perhaps there is no need for a witness for one whose valour is known in all the three worlds I will do this I will eat the piece of meat left over by the dog (Eats it and becomes crazy) Alas! I am killed! I am killed by tears (Weeps and looks around) Who is it that beats me! (Looking) You wicked boys! I am the nephew of what is his name, as Ghatotkaca was of Bhimasena
Further you listen

A hundred fiends with different forms
Holding pikes, my belly holds,
With a hundred tigers that terrify
From mouth I spit out great serpents (19)

How they trouble me! Be pleased youngmen, be pleased You don't trouble me on account of this piece of meat (Looking ahead) Why, there is our preceptor Suranandin I will approach him (Runs up)

PASUPATA Hey! This lunatic comes hither He is—Wearing a robe of spotted rags used and cast off,
The hair rough, dishevelled and full of ash and dust
Yet wearing garlands—the remains of offerings,
Flocks of crows do tend on him for leavings,
A heap of village litter that moves in human form (20)

MADMAN I will go to him (Approaching) Venerable sir, please accept this skull which I have obtained from a most respectable dog belonging to a Candala.

PASUPATA (Casting a glance) Let it be given to a worthy recipient,

MADMAN O revered Brahmin, be pleased with me

BUDDHIST MONK This revered Kapalin is worthy of it

MADMAN (Approaching the Kapalin, placing the skull on the ground and falling at his feet after going around him from left to right) O great god! Be pleased Here I raise my hands in salutation

KAPALIN Our skull!

DEVASOMA Yes, it is so!

KAPALIN By the grace of god once again I have become a Kapalin (Wants to take it)

MADMAN You son of a slave! Eat poison! (Snatches away the skull and goes on his way)

KAPALIN (Pursuing) This messenger of Yama is taking away
my life You both help me!

BOTH Yes, both of us will help you

(All of them block the way)

KAPALIN Hey! You stop, stop!

MADMAN Why do they stop me?

KAPALIN You give our skull and be off

MADMAN Fool! Why don't you see? This is a golden bowl

KAPALIN Who is it that made such a golden bowl?

MADMAN Revered sir, I call it a golden bowl since it was made by the brother in law of the goldsmith who dons a gold coloured robe

BUDDHIST MONK What do you say?

MADMAN It is a golden bowl

BUDDHIST MONK Is he a madman?

MADMAN I hear the word 'madman' oftentimes You take this and show me the madman (Hands over the skull to the Kapalin)

KAPALIN (Taking the bowl) There he is just behind the wall Make haste and follow him

MADMAN I am pleased

(The madman retires in haste)

BUDDHIST MONK O wonderful! I am delighted at the gain of my opponent

KAPALIN (Embracing the skull)

For long have I done penance unbroken,
Intact is my devotion to holy Mahesvara,
O blessed skull! since you are seen, to my joy,
Now, He has just gone to oblivion (21)

DEVASOMA Revered sir my eyes are delighted now when I behold you like the evening in conjunction with the moon

PASUPATA Fortunately you are well off

KAPALIN Indeed, sir, the success is yours

PASUPATA (To himself) It is true that the innocent has nothing to be afraid of, for the monk has just been saved from the jaws of tiger (Aloud) Now I go to await the 'smoke hour' of the god of the eastern shrine having taken to my heart the joy at the success of the friend Henceforth—

May your dispute, fore ordained,
 Be everlasting, a source of mutual joy,
 As that between Kirata and Arjuna (22)

(The Pasupata retires)

KAPALIN O Nagasena, since I have offended you I beseech
 you to forgive me

BUDDHIST MONK What is there to be sought for? What shall I do to please you?

KAPALIN If your Reverence is pleased with me what more shall I seek for?

BUDDHIST MONK I am on my way

KAPALIN Good bye, sir We shall meet you again

BUDDHIST MONK So be it (Exit)

KAPALIN Dear Devasoma! Let us go

(Epilogue)

May the sacred fire ever carry oblations
 Bestowed on it for the good of mankind
 May the Brahmins take recourse to Vedas,
 May the kine give milk in plenty,
 And as long as there are moon and stars
 Let men intent on their duty, bereft of all distress,
 Be under the sway of a worthy king
 In Sa trumalla who extinguished foes by might (23)

(Exeunt both)

The end

NOTES

Vyaptavanibhajanam etc Here there is an allusion to the author's title Avanibhajana which is so dearly used by him in his inscriptions (See introduction, p 11)

Yauvanagunabhara etc The phrase contains two of the author's titles Gunabhara and Mattavilasa mentioned in his inscriptions. (See introduction p 12) One of his inscriptions read

*Gunabhara namani rajani
Anena lingena lingini jnanam
Prathanciraya loke
Vipaksavrtteh paravrttam*

This has been rendered as 'while the king called Gunabhara is a worshipper of the linga, let the knowledge which has turned back from hostile (vipaksa) conduct be spread for a long time in the world by this linga '

Sangitadhanah etc This epithet ascribed to the Sutra-dhara is also suggestive of the royal author's talents in music Gandharvasastra has been mentioned in the very first line of his Mamandur inscription The words 'apraptapurvannirvestu vadyasravanakrtativata' and 'kanthasrutigunavasadhanasampadah' etc, occurring in the inscription seem to suggest that he wanted to achieve what was not achieved before in the realm of music The title Sankirnajati (see introduction p. 12) was perhaps assumed by him since he has invented a particular method of musical time It may also represent a mixed raga wherein traces of two or more ragas are discernible

Dhrrna dhrrna namah etc The word is used in the sense of some sort of blessings Manuscripts give various forms for this as—dhrrna dhrrna and dhirna dhirna The usage seems to be peculiar to the Saivites of the Kapalika sect Ms G notes dhirna dhirna namah sivayeti tesam samaye asih '

Peya sura etc The verse occurring in our play has been ascribed to Bhasa by Somadeva in his Yasastilaka. This however does not deprive the authorship of the verse to Mahendra vikrama since anthologists are often found to depend on their memory in ascribing verses to authors.

Esa surapana yajnavatavibhutim etc The liquorshop is here compared to a sacrificial ground. Yupa is the sacrificial post to which animals are tied before killing them for sacrificial purposes. Soma juice forms an offering of drink. Ritviks are those priests who perform the rites. Camasa is a ladle used in sacrifices. Havis are specially cooked offerings of solid foods. Directions and ritual formulae are compared with the wild utterances of intoxicated men who frequent such shops. Their gay songs are likened to Sama hymns sung at sacrifices. The manager of the shop is conceived as the chief patron who causes the sacrifice to be conducted by providing facilities.

Rajavihara etc According to Hieun Tsang the city of Kanci was about six miles in circumference. He notes that there were more than a hundred Buddhist monasteries with more than ten thousand Teravadin monks. To the south of the city there was a large monastery where the eminent men of the country used to assemble. Scholars hold that this monastery may be identified with the Rajavihara referred to by the Sakyabhiksu in our play.

Ekamravasi etc Ms. G. comments Ekampavasi ekampakhya sivaçetre vastum silam asya. That our author is familiar with the locality is evident from the presence of one of his inscriptions found in a pillar situated inside the temple. The pillar is carved in the typical Mahendra style.

Samvrtasatyam etc The Kapala makes fun of the distinctions entertained by some schools of Buddhists between samvrtasatya literally truth in concealment or relative verity and paramarthikasatya or transcendental or noumenal reality.

Namah Kharapataya etc Kharapata as an author of the science of thieving is known since the time of Arthashastra. It is only reasonable to suppose that Mahendravikrama has quoted the tradition. The tradition of making Kharapata the guardian deity of thieves is a fairly old one and Bhasa also in Carudatta has mentioned him. It has been suggested that he is identical with Muladeva or Karnisuta the famous character mentioned in old Indian literature.

Yena mundanam ħrstam etc Buddhist monks have to shave off their heads according to their canons. Now it has come as a blessing for Nagasena when Devasoma tries to seize hold of his hair in her fury. She falls down in the attempt since there is nothing to seize upon.

Priyatamapanigrahanam etc, The word 'panigrahana', literally means 'taking of the hand', though it is generally used to denote marriage in which the bridegroom has to take the hands of the bride as enjoined by the rites. Here the Kapalin plays on the popular sense of the word to embarrass the Buddhist monk who took the hands of Devasoma out of compassion. Buddhist monks should practise celibacy.

Yad asmabhih etc This seems to be a proverbial phrase taken from an anustubh verse. The Pasupata on seeing his own consort being seduced by the Kapalin, makes this observation.

Siksapadam etc There are 'ten articles of discipline' ordained for the Buddhists. Here the Bhiksu repeats five out of the ten to clear himself of the imputation cast on him by the Kapalin. He suggests that he is a firm follower of the Buddhist canons.

Pitamahasiraccheda etc The reference is to a legend in Hindu mythology. According to it once Brahman offended Siva who assumed his terrible phase as Bhairava and cut Brahman's head by his thumb nail. It is the skull of that head which he carries with him in his phase as Kapalin.

God Indra killed Vŗtra the tripple-headed son of Tvastar. The Vedic poets often praise Indra for this action.

Both these gods had to perform expiatory rites to absolve themselves of the sin incurred by them

Pasyantu pasyantu Mahesvaras etc Dr L. D. Barnett remarks "This speech in the printed edition is assigned to the Kapalin, obviously by error. He assigns it to Pasupata in his translation. But the present editor is for retaining it according to the printed edition. The Kapalin is sure that the bowl concealed by the clothes of the Buddhist belongs to him despite the difference in its colour. So he makes a derisive remark like this. All the manuscripts support this view. Moreover, it is for the third time that the Kapalin addresses the Mahesvara in an effort to establish the injustice done by the Buddhists Mayasantiuna etc. There is a pun on the double meaning of the word Maya. The name of Buddha's mother is also given as Maya. The word also denotes illusion in the context thereby suggesting that the Buddhists are jugglers.

Danaparamita etc. It means Perfection of bounty, which is the first among several such perfections ascribed to the Buddha. The Sakyabhikṣu here is ready to hand over his own bowl to the Kapalin just to be relieved of his trouble when the latter compliments the former comparing his act to danaparamita. A note of sarcasm also is hinted at by his words.

Gramasukara etc. Ms. G gives the following comments: Gramasukarah kukkurah tasya galam kantham gaganam utpatis tena maya svaganena saha Atavatam pratibhanyja grhitah sasutah tilingala iti unmattapralapah Bhagineyah etc. Ghatotkaca was the son of Bhimasena and not his nephew as contended by the lunatic. Here he shows his ignorance and confusion regarding the characters of the Epics. According to Ms. G the lunatic claims himself to be the nephew of Vasudeva.

Yavad enam upasarpami etc. Ms. G gives a different reading and comments: yavad enam upalarami pujaami Asya rajase

kapalam itī sesah ' After this the words 'Bhaga an, nastakena vandamī' occur

Candrasamagatam etc Here the Kapalin with his dark body smeared all over with gray ashes is compared with the gray evening atmosphere and the white skull to the moon. Saiva mendicants smear their body with ashes consisting of burnt cow dung in lieu of ashes from cremation grounds. This is to emulate Siva who wears the ashes collected from cremation grounds.

Purīasthalī etc The reference is to the neighbourhood of the Ekamranatha temple at Kanci where the deity installed is Siva. This is also referred to earlier by the Buddhist when he remarks that the wicked Kapalin is a resident of Ekamra.

Dhumavela etc Pasupatas are supposed to haunt the cremation grounds as ordained by their spiritual disciplines. Such grounds are often located to the immediate vicinity of Saiva temples.

Vīrodhak etc The story of Arjuna's penance which results in a fight between him and Siva who assumes the form of a Kīrāta to test his devotee is alluded to here. The dispute ends with a happy note since both the parties are satisfied at the outcome of the issue.

Satrumallena etc The epilogue of the farce mentions yet another title of our author as Satrumalla (see introduction p. 12). Mahendravikrama has scooped a cave temple at Dalavanur called Satrumallesvara named after his title.

MATTAVILASA TIPPANAM

[This metrical commentary or tippanam in 41 verses is an elaborate discussion on the first stanza of Mattavilasaprahasana. It has been pointed out that the Cakyars of Kerala used to put on the farce in a peculiar way using the verses from the Kumarasambhava of Kalidasa to enact the introductory portion of the adapted version. This tippanam composed by an anonymous author, who probably was a member of the Cakyar community, refers to the various verses of Kumarasambhava pointing out the different emotions suggested by them. It is composed for the benefit of the practising Cakyar.]

This is obtained from a palm leaf manuscript with the register number 17946 preserved in the Oriental Research Institute and Manuscripts Library of the Kerala University. The script is Malayalam. The manuscript is roughly 300 years old. It is written on a single leaf, twenty inches long and having a width of two inches. This is perhaps the only manuscript of the work now available.

The work was originally noticed by the present editor in the pages of the Journal of Oriental Research Institute and Manuscripts Library of the University of Kerala, Vol XIX No 1 2, pp 7-17]

KOKILASANDESA OF UDDANDA

Ed By DR N. P UNNI

This lyric of 162 verses belongs to the class of Sandesa-kavyas inaugurated by the Meghaduta and bids fair to attain its mellifluous delectability. The messenger here is aptly a Kokila which is chosen as it is the Shashtham or sixth astram of Kamadeva (in II 47). This versatile poet steeped in Kalidāsan lore, was, we are informed in the learned introduction, born in Chingleput, but became domiciled in Kerala where he was patronised by Manavikrama of Calicut who ruled from 1467 to 1475 A. D. The editor has done an excellent job and deserves the sincere gratitude of all orientalists.

The Hindu

"Kokilasandesa is a valuable poem, rich in information about the 15th century Kerala. Thus no less than 19 temple towns, 13 political regions or cities, 8 rivers and 2 festivals, besides a number of literary, religious and political personalities find place in the said descriptions. One can well imagine what a mine of contemporary information the present work happens to be.

The editor, besides giving a critical edition of this charming poem, has, in his 50 page introduction, given a good account of Uddanda, his times and contemporaries, an idea of his works and a resume of the Kokilasandesa. The notes and indexes supplied by him add to the usefulness of this edition. He deserves to be congratulated for presenting a fine work in Sanskrit produced in Kerala to readers outside that region in a very attractive form."

BHASA PLAYS

A STUDY IN MANUSCRIPTS

"Barring the controversial Yajñaphalam" observes Dr. V. Raghavan, "no new manuscript material or other fresh evidence has come to light on the standing problem of Bhasa." Indeed, the question is so vexed that some consider it as "beyond discussion!"

Here is an attempt to study the problem from a new angle. Complete and authentic details of nearly 200 manuscripts of plays attributed to Bhasa available in the various libraries, though remaining unnoticed by scholars for want of information, is presented here for the first time. Of these manuscripts more than 150 are yet to be made use of by editors. Nearly all of them are on palm leaves and in the local vernacular Malayalam. The various aspects dealt with herein include the different titles of the plays, the problem of authorship, a survey of Bhasa manuscripts, Bhasa plays on the Kerala stage etc. etc.

The present author's chief interest is to revive the discussion on the problem in the light of fresh manuscript materials on which information is presented here. He also wishes to point out the ample scope for the critical editions of these works taking into account the stage practices of these plays wherein the professional actors in Kerala try to bring out the "inner significance" of these plays.
